that she agreed with me." "Perhaps I saw it when I called on you," Mrs. Tenbruggen suggested. "Where did the picture hang ?" "My dear! I received you in the dining room, and the portrait houg in Mr. Gracedien's study." What they said to each other next escaped my attention. Quite unconsciously, Miss Jillgall had revealed to me a danger which neither the Minister nor I had discovered, though it had conspicuously threatened us both on the wall of the study. The act of mad destruction which, if I had possessed the means of safely interfering I should certainly have endeavoured to prevent. now assumed a rewand startling aspect. If Mrs. Tenbruggen really had some motive of her own for endeavouring to identify the adopted child the preservation of the picture must have led her straight to the end in view. The most casual opportunity of comparing Helena with the portrait of Mrs. Gracedien, would have revealed the likeness between mother and daughter-and, that result attained, the identification of Eunice with the infant whom the "Miss Chance" of those days had brought to the prison, must inevitably have followed. It was perhaps natural I could depend on her to tell me the truth, was that Mr. Gracedieu's infatuated devotion to the quite another thing, memory of his wife should have blind d him to the betrayal of Helena's parentage, which met his eyes every time he entered his study. But that I should have been too stupid to discover what he had failed to see, was a wound dealt to
